■ If the CIA happens to have an opening for an undercover man who's also an experienced movie producer, the agency could do worse than to hire Henry Morgenthau III. He already has a good "cover" firm, complete with printed stationery, business cards and a fake bank account. Mr. Morgenthau, son of President Roosevelt's Secretary of the Treasury, went to South Africa to film a documentary attacking that country's severe apartheid policies and, in order to avoid the stringent censorship, set up a bogus film company that threw snooping officials off the track. When he had finished shooting, Morgenthau packed his film in a box labeled "Zulu beads" and shipped it off to the U.S.
